Throughout its history, Minorca, the northernmost of the Balearic Islands and the easternmost point of Spain, has successfully maintained and respected everything that has made it the special, atypical place it is.

In the north of the island, on a winding coastline that has not yet been affected by tourism and which has high environmental and landscape value, among salt marshes, cliffs and beautiful coves, Fornells looks onto the sea from its bay of calm, crystal-clear water.

Fornells brings together the tradition of its fishing-village origin with modern times, making it one of the last remaining places in which the essence of Mediterranean life can still be enjoyed.
